Advocates, Activists & @-holes

Advance "open" by defining your default mode

6/14/17 -- Micah Vandegrift

Advocate

- Focus energy on information sharing with student groups about OER to inspire action.
- Develop really comprehensive Research Guides on open data policies.
- Develop and build relationships with a faculty governance body to serve as a resource for questions about "topics in academic publishing."

- Mode of work = hustle
- Goal = steadfast, solid work toward openness

Activist

- Seed and feed student groups resources and info to stage a sit-in at the campus bookstore for textbook affordability.
- Offer a mini-grant to the researcher that negotiates the most publication contracts toward openness in a single semester.
- Assist graduate students on going full "no-quest" with their ETD in spite of grad school policies.

- Mode of work = bustle
- Goal = induce change through action

@-hole

- post to popular scholcomm listservs annually calling for a strike of librarians against any/all LIS journals that are not open access.
- be dogmatic about a publication agreement, and blog the entire process
- take a national platform like a webinar to poke fun at another school in their state that seems to be working at cross purposes to openness by making deals with a certain publisher to prepopulate an institutional repository with records that lead to not fully open versions of research.

- Mode of work = rustle
- Goal = elicit passionate "exchanges"

"Is it to early for me to issue my annual call for a Great Librarian Walk-Out on Academic Publishing?

What would happen if this October [for Open Access Week] we encouraged our colleagues to no longer submit our work to a system that continues to undermine our core principle of access for all?"

Proof

Posted on 2013/01/30 by Micah Vandegrift

UPDATE (3/25): The Editorial Board of the Journal of Library Administration has resigned, citing the reason that "...the licensing terms in the Taylor & Francis author agreement are too restrictive and out-of-step with the expectations of authors in the LIS community."

Read more about it on The Chronicle of Higher Ed, on Chronicle Blogs here, from one of the Editors, and from a fellow librarian who also stood his ground on licensing his work.

Brief: I published an article. But before all that, I negotiated my publication contract and had a really great experience doing so. This is the story.

Don't be an @-hole

Advocate with clarity.
Activate with passion.
Rouse rabble with caution and care.

Openness will increase through measured, consistent, focused, strategic work.